

The Importance of Planning and Forecasting with a Distributor

At Soligent, we pride ourselves on the relationships we build with our installation partners. We're not just another supplier — we're a true extension of your team. Our Regional Account Managers are often in the field, visiting partners and holding regular meetings to review their pipelines. We take the time to understand your business rhythm, discuss upcoming projects, and map out the materials you'll need to ensure everything is available exactly when required. This proactive approach minimizes downtime, helps projects stay on schedule, and gives installers the confidence to take on more work knowing Soligent has their back.

Planning and forecasting like this isn't always imperative when the market is flush with inventory and lead times are short. However, when supply chain challenges arise—as we're beginning to see again—it becomes more important than ever to have a trusted partner who understands your needs, communicates clearly, and plans ahead with you.

A significant supply chain issue has now hit the module space. Almost every major module manufacturer is sold out for the remainder of 2025, and several domestic content options are already committed through the end of 2026. Demand remains high, and with new incentive programs pushing installers toward U.S.-made modules, competition for available inventory has intensified. At this point, if Soligent—or another distributor—doesn't already know about your project, you may have difficulty securing materials in time.

That's why we strongly recommend reaching out to your Regional Account Manager to schedule a forecasting meeting. A brief conversation today can make all the difference in ensuring your upcoming installs stay on track. The solar coaster continues to be a wild ride, but with Soligent as your partner, you'll have the insight, inventory, and industry expertise to navigate every turn. We're proud to be in the seat next to you—supporting your success through every high and low the solar market brings.
